I'm not so sure adding destination shops to Dodger Stadium would work in the same way as at other baseball stadiums, like the Giants' stadium in San Francisco, Wrigley Field in Chicago or Camden Yards in Baltimore. Those stadiums are in urban neighborhoods with pedestrian traffic nearby. I would not want to battle the traffic around Dodger Stadium to go to a restaurant or shopping, unless there was a Metro stop nearby.

My initial thought is, I'm coming from Tampa, and we have had community relations problems professional team, it's important to garner support from local businesses, from that perspective I think it's a good idea. I think it'll put more fans in the stands. If my wife knows that she can go shopping halfway through the game, she'll be more likely to come with me.

At no cost to the consumer – and I believe they are talking about doing this in the parking lot area or centerfield – the restaurant part is probably a good idea. It gives the fan another viable option, as long as it allows all fans to get in. It allows people to get to the game earlier, and eat at a table instead of on their lap in the stadium. People will be getting there earlier, we will alleviate some incoming traffic. It would also be nice to view the stadium, possibly watch batting practice. I would even do that.

I'm fine with the concept because these structural changes are taking place outside of the ballpark itself and won't interfere with the beauty and tradition of a game at Dodger Stadium. I will add a Dodger Hall of Fame that future generations can appreciate. The Dodger Stadium that future generations have meant to baseball America. I have visited more than 100 league parks; Dodger Stadium should never, ever be torn down.

I look forward to dining at one of the restaurants before a game and celebrating a win with a little shopping on the way
